EPA Revives IRIS Formaldehyde Assessment To Inform TSCA Evaluation

EPA is resuming the formaldehyde IRIS assessment that Trump-era officials froze and refused to release, with plans to use its findings in a TSCA evaluation of the ubiquitous chemical – presenting a high-risk, high-reward strategy that could help the agency meet its TSCA deadline to evaluate formaldehyde by 2023, if the assessment does not stall again. FULL STORY

EPA Drops IRIS ‘Survey’ Process, Seeks New Assessment Candidates

EPA is abandoning controversial Trump-era reforms to the Integrated Risk Information System (IRIS) risk assessment program and asking agency offices to submit new lists of chemicals for possible review, a high-profile reversal after the Trump administration sidelined IRIS assessments in favor of TSCA chemical evaluations. FULL STORY

Regan Faces Immediate Call For TSCA Asbestos Ban After Confirmation

Environmentalists are already pressing newly confirmed EPA Administrator Michael Regan to strengthen the agency's TSCA implementation, and specifically to rework the Trump-era evaluation of asbestos in order to justify a full ban on the substance, following on his promise to a senator that he would revisit the assessment once in office. FULL STORY
